

Notes on Nothing in Particular

J. Anonymous

A working note, circulated without a publisher and without a preprint server, so it was never assigned an identifier of any kind. The pages below are ordinary prose.

The first thing to say about fixtures is that they should be boring. A fixture that surprises its reader is a fixture that will surprise a test.

Further notes

The second thing to say is that a fixture should be small.
Every byte of it is read by someone reviewing a change, and bytes that carry no meaning cost attention for nothing.
